Current as of Thursday 1/7. An interactive map of Delaware County testing sites can be found at www.delcopa.gov/testing.

This document lists active COVID-19 test sites in Delaware County.

Please note that this is accurate at the time of publication; however, changes to test sites occur frequently and it is possible that this document may not reflect current information for every site. Many sites require an appointment or pre-registration, or may require a referral from your doctor, so it is strongly recommended that you call or visit the website associated with the test site that you elect to visit and verify the information before visiting any specific test site.

COVID-19 TESTING AT A GLANCE

The most widely used test to diagnose COVID-19 right now is a molecular test which detects genetic material (ribonucleic acid, or RNA) from the virus. These are sometimes called nucleic acid amplification (NAAT) tests or polymerase chain reaction (PCR) tests based on the method of testing. Sometimes people refer to these tests by the way they are collected, such as nasopharyngeal swab test, nasal swab test, or oropharyngeal swab test. Antigen tests (also called serology or antibody tests) are also available. These tests detect antigens, which are proteins on the surface of the virus that our immune system recognizes. Antibody tests look for the body's response to an infection instead of looking for the virus itself. Antibodies are proteins that the body makes to fight off infections. Because it takes days to weeks for the body to create antibodies, these types of tests are not recommended for initial diagnosis of COVID-19, and are not used to tell people if they have an active case of COVID-19 at the time of the test.
